

the course in slave society. Like maybe instead of reaching for drugs to cope consider instead walking out and leaving the situation that's making you feel that way especially since that's probably the scariest possibility. Or even just start exploring and wandering. Become a saunterer errant. Beats me.

Sources:

TAZ, Ploughing the Clouds, and Scandal by Peter Lamborn

Wilson/Hakim Bey

Manual for a worldwide manuke revolt by Matsumoto Hajime

Against Mass Society by Chris Wilson

Anarchism and Individualism by Georges Palante

Walking by David Thoreau

The Unique and its Property by Max Stirner

Consensus Submission Making by Jason Rodgers

Justice: Primitive and Modern by Bob Black

<https://warzonedistro.noblogs.org/post/category/straight-edgeradical-sobriety/>

feral distro

feraldistro.noblogs.org

feraldistro@proton.me

THE ANARCHIST

TENSION REGARDING

DRUG USE

MICHIKO MALANDRO

When a situation gets difficult I find myself reaching for drugs. What would happen if I didn't get high? Would I sour relationships with needless disagreement? But I seem to do that while stoned. LOL.

I think the whole say "fuck you" instead of "sorry" is stupid. Call me a coward for wanting to avoid conflict I don't care.

Maybe weed pushes me to be more productive. Maybe it makes stuff I'd rather not do easier, in which case the anti work thing to do would be to quit. What function does alcohol or weed perform for society, for civilization? Would anger overflow into the streets if everyone went straight edge? But that's not convincing either; abusive alcoholic is a common term, and there are plenty of sober people who have jobs and are squares. If alcohol really is a depressive, then maybe people are drawn to being depressed. Industrial civilization is often a terribly boring, empty, and sad affair so that makes sense.

These conversations sometimes lead to the idea(ology) of Justice. It doesn't make sense to me how conflict resolution (justice) could be carried out on the scale of mass society. How could strangers come to a compromise or understanding? It's absurd to think that one size fits all.

Probably not a good idea to attack the existent while high, unless you're doing it imaginally. But hey maybe alcohol gives you the courage to foment a manuke revolt. Mysteriously disappearing, going to Croatan and growing weed to get high, can't exactly call that perpetuating slave society; but only a moralist would care about that; I'd prefer desire.

Leisure time is the safety valve of boredom for our society. Hippies in the 60's thought acid would precipitate a global anarchist revolution, instead of bolo'bolo we got professionals legally microdosing psilocybin in Oregon to maximize their efficiency. Efficiency is the devil's shit.

Calling in to work to get high could be cool, and getting so high you quit your job could be even cooler. I'm sure some people are convinced that this way of life is the only possibility and drink to forget that for a moment. This society has abolished adventure, paving the way for the simulation of adventure through television. On the other hand, many sufi poets did quiet well for themselves writing poetry under the influence of heroin and alcohol. Certainly drugs like xanax are used to help people conform by flattening their emotional affect and I can't see the benefit in that. But hey then again it makes some people kleptos. If the government is prescribing you drugs I doubt they'd give you any that'd subvert this project. But hey who knows right? I think it's funny to imagine a straight edge person knee capping a small time drug dealer who just doesn't want a regular job and in some ways lives at the margin of society because drugs are bad. But hell who knows maybe they are. In a temporary autonomous zone maybe breaking out of old habits wouldn't have to entail leaving drugs behind. Surely not since a dinner party could be a taz. I'm skeptical of absolutes, and the for and against drug ideas are both absolutes. If you keep doing the drug even though it makes you feel bad you might be its slave, but that's par for